

Why Frog and Snake Play together

(The book of virtues)

181 words

Once upon a time, a frog was hopping along in the bush when he saw someone new lying across the path. This someone was long and thin, and his skin seemed to shine like a rainbow.

"Hello there, my name is Snake. What's yours?"

"I'm Frog. Would you like to play with me?"

Both of them were afraid of each other because they didn't know each other but frog and Snake played together all morning.

"Watch what I can do," said Frog, and he hopped high into the air.

"I'll teach you how, if you want," he offered.

So he taught Snake how to hop, and together they hopped up and down the path.

"Now watch what I can do," said Snake, and he crawled on his belly up a tall tree. "I'll teach you if you want."

So he taught Frog how to slide on his belly and climb into trees.

They both learned that if you give new people a chance they can make you happy.
